The boy discovers Bruno and realizes that, despite their transformations, they have retained their personalities, voices, and brains. By taking some of the potion and putting it into the witches' meal, the boy devises a scheme to convert all of the witches into mice. The plot works: all of the witches are changed into mice and murdered by the hotel employees and customers. After coming home, the kid and his grandma develop a strategy to use the potion to exterminate all of the world's witches. The boy is still a mouse, and his life expectancy is just nine years; nonetheless, he is unconcerned because he will live as long as his grandmother.

being left an orphan, the nameless jonist, known only as the boy, moves h his grandmother. The boy and his lma get along swimmingly. She es him numerous stories about es, including how to spot them and being harmed by them. Witches ble human women except they have features that help distinguish them regular women as they are bald, have d hands, lack toes and they are evil ters that prey on children.

Due to the abundance of rhyming in this book, Dahl's approach is rather distinctive. The witches always utilize rhymes in their charms. Page 85 features a very long song written in rhyming couplets and performed by the Grand High Witch. Dahl's language is also highly exact, especially in his descriptions. "Meet him in the hotel lobby and he is stuffing sponge cake into his mouth. Pass him in the corridor and he is fishing potato crisps out of a bag by the fistful..." (Page 95) the narrator adds about Bruno. Dahl is able to offer the reader a very clear idea of what the characters are like by using terms like "stuffing" and "fishing". Overall, the narrative is fairly daring, with amusing comedy and simple language, making it suitable and interesting for people of all ages.
